The enthusiasm and thrust for civil renovation nourished by the Risorgimento has been kept alive in his critical writings, in which culture and society are always presented as strictly entangled. After moving to Rome in Capuana leaves partially behind the themes inherited from the European naturalist novel, and opens up to the influences of a more spiritualist stream of thought, as it is paramount in his second novel, Profumo, published in Il marchese di Roccaverdina: tra scienza e fede. His most important text in this sense is Tempo di edificare, published in The author draws in these pages the portrayal of a writer who strives for this change.
